

I believe in my community

Brant United Way

Local Business Show their Community Spirit

For Immediate Release

August 10, 2009

Local businesses are set to show how much they believe in their community by getting their hands dirty this week for Brant United Way's Days of Caring.

As part of the lead up to Brant United Way's Annual Campaign, Lynden Park Mall, DistribuTech and The Williamson Group have all mobilized teams of employees to work in the community this week on August 11th, 12th and 13th, while S. C. Johnson employees will be helping out at an event in September. Volunteers will perform a variety of tasks for Brant United Way's Member Agencies, including landscaping, painting, and interacting with clients.

For local businesses, the "Days of Caring" provide an opportunity for their employees to bond with each other, while demonstrating their commitment to the community and gaining an appreciation for where their donations to United Way help out. For Member Agencies, the day is an opportunity to have much-needed work done that can't always be afforded on the tight budgets under which they operate.

Brant United Way is excited to offer this great community-building event, and is hopeful that the weather will cooperate this week. If successful, Days of Caring has the potential to become an annual event. "There is no better feeling than lending a hand, seeing finished results and knowing that you have made a valuable contribution to your community. If you are a business which would like to be involved with the United Way, we encourage you to call us," states Dianne Austin, Executive Director, Brant United Way.

Brant United Way provides funds to 18 Member Agencies which provide essential human services and programs to citizens throughout Brantford and Brant County. For more information on Days of Caring or Brant United Way's Annual Campaign, please contact info@brantunitedway.org or call 519-752-7848.
